MEANWHILE, BACK IN THE HOUSE...

"Now remember," Mother Bird whispered to Bertie Bird and Brother Billie, "Grandpa Bird isn't as young as he used to be, so look out for him and take it easy!"

The two brothers nodded their heads in understanding. "We'll be our most unstrenuous selves," Bertie promised. "It's only for one day, after all."

"What hol Where are my guides?" Grandpa's voice boomed out heartily. "Let's get going on our sight-seeing tour!"

"We're ready, Grandpa," Bertie said, hopping to the edge of the tree branch. "May we help you down?" he asked politely.

In answer, Grandpa Bird soared up into the air, twitching his nose. "I take it the ocean's this way. Come along, my hearties! I feel like a swim!"

Bertie and Billie hurried after him. "Not so fast, Grandpa!" Billie panted, struggling to catch up with his elderly relative, "you'll be worn-out before we get started, at this rate!"

"Eh what?" Grandpa shouted. "Can't hear with the breeze in my ear!" He sailed over the beach and landed with a plop on top of a giant wave.

"Oh dear!" Bertie cried, "I don't even see him!"

"Me neither," Billie worried. "Come on, he may be drowning!"

Just as they landed in the water, a huge wave broke over the little birds' heads, and the current pulled them down, down, down! Then just as suddenly, the water threw them up in the air again.

"Gotta watch out for those waves," Grandpa cautioned, "they get mighty pesky this time of year," and he deposited his grandsons safely on shore.

"Whew!" Bertie gasped, blinking the water out of his eyes. "Brrr," Brother Billie protested, shivering.

"What you need is some action!" Grandpa told them. "Get your circulation going."

"I'm not sure I have any circulation!" Bertie gulped, as he staggered after his grandfather.

"Look out!" Grandpa warned suddenly. "There's a trap in that tree!" But he spoke too late.

Both Bertie and Billie were caught up in Charlie Catbird's mesh of branches! And as Bertie struggled frantically to free his leg, he saw two gleaming eyes peering down from the top of the tree. "Oh me," he shivered, "it's Charlie, himself!"

The giant catbird pounced, but Grandpa was faster. He caught hold of Charlie's tail and hung on fiercely. Charlie circled and dived through the air, but he could not shake the old bluebird. Then, Grandpa Bird leaned over and nipped the catbird. Letting out a squawk of pain, Charlie fled off into the woods.

"Pesky old critter, isn't he?" Grandpa commented mildly as he freed his grandsons.

Later that evening, relaxing at their home in Apple Tree Lane, Bertie and Billie heard their Mother say, "I'm so glad the boys took such good care of you, Father. You hardly look tired at all!"

Grandpa chuckled. "Don't feel tired! Matter of fact, I'd like to stay another day."

There was a low groan from the back of the tree house.

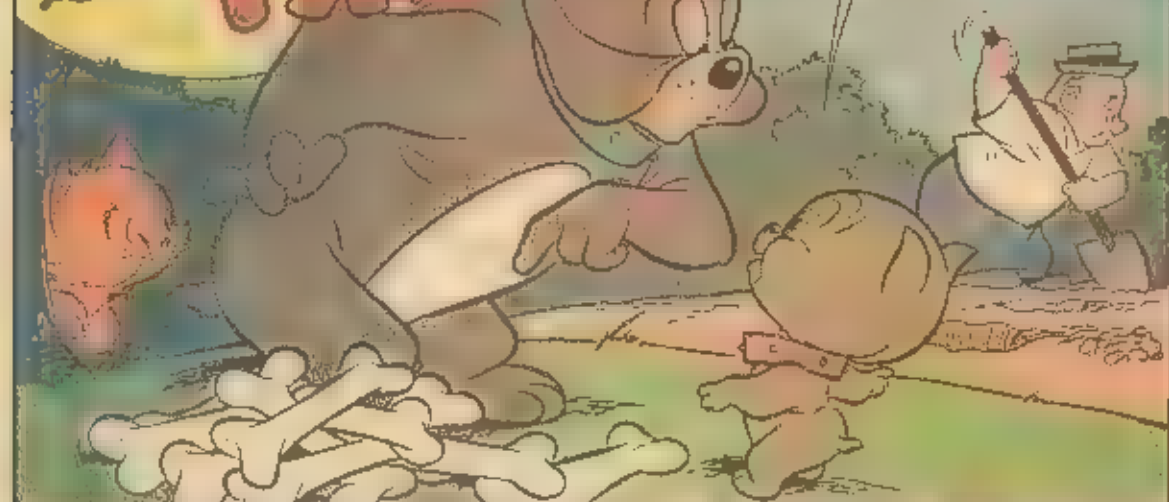

"That is," Grandpa added, his eyes twinkling merrily, "if it won't tire the children!"
